

“It’s Time To Accept That BuzzFeed, Huffpo, Newsweek, Washpo are No Longer Journalists. They’re Political Activists”

by Jim Hoft 168 Comments

281 Share

74 Tweet

Email

Guest post by Mike LaChance at American Lookout:

The liberal media doesn't just ask questions and report the news. They shape the narrative and they have been trying to "get" Trump since he won the election. It's time to call them what they are – activists.

Eddie Scarry writes at the Washington Examiner:

Universal truths about the media in 2017

New year, new media? Good luck with that.

As the first full year of President Trump's time in office wraps up, there's absolutely no indication the national media want to do anything different, even if there's every reason they should.

Out of the major newspapers, the Wall Street Journal's opinion page stands alone in providing anything that even looks sort of like a reasonable perspective on the still-young White House.

The Washington Post, New York Times, and USA Today still refuse to employ a single columnist that won't begin each piece with anything less than "Mr. Trump, you are a liar!"

CNN this year had to retract one story and significantly modify a second one (both were related to Trump and Russia) after it turned out the former wasn't supported by any facts (otherwise often referred to as "fiction") and the latter was inaccurate to the point of libel.

Brian Ross, with his apparent lifetime tenure at ABC News, was suspended in early December after he once again reported catastrophically wrong information about Trump and, of course, Russia...

Acosta may be harmless on his own, but when the sea of media decide to rewrite the standards for covering a presidency, to assume an "attitude," it's time to accept that they're no longer journalists. They're activists.

He's absolutely right and most people have finally caught on to their little game.